night of June 21. The Lakers' No. 2 selection, Vanderbilt center and Oklahoma State-product Darius Garland, is expected to be UCLA point guard Lonzo Ball's backup on a team with another former baller in LeBron James. That's about it for NBA draft coverage right now. That is, unless you're a baller who ended up on Twitter late Wednesday night. In that case, you probably grabbed a beer with a few friends and fired up the Snapchat or some other social media app. The NBA's social media reach is nearing its peak for 2018, at least according to a poll on NBA.com. NBA.com and Next Gen Stats looked at social media trends in the month leading up to the draft and the countdown to the event. The methodology includes the following: Total mentions over the course of the month Interactive activity, new audience growth and engagement Overall reach across platforms (Twitter, Facebook, Instagram, YouTube and Snapchat) Overall impressions (the aggregate number of individual impressions across each platform) Reach share (the percentage of impressions across each platform)
