The free PS app includes layers, frames, and the ability to group objects to make it easy to command attention to parts of a document. However, those layers exist only on the iPad Pro screen, so they don't always stay in sync with the desktop version on your Mac. And the iPad Pro screen is a better canvas for editing: For instance, dark backgrounds can be more easily done on an iPad Pro than on a MacBook (the MacBook screen is a lot brighter). A lot of people worry about losing workflow efficiency as they switch to the Mac. But, really, what that means is that they're working in an ideal environment for their needs. For them, not many things in a workflow life cycle are scripted, well-practiced, or quite as elegant. To work in a way that best fits their workflow, and that enables them to be more effective, is actually the more efficient path. Designers and artists who find themselves or their clients struggling to adapt because their workflow and an existing or beloved tool is no longer available on the MacBook will increasingly find the iPad new tools for them. There is a more natural way of working on the iPad with some of the features that are available only on the iPad Pro beyond what you can find on the Mac. If your workflows are already based on the Mac, they might not change, but I suspect they'll change anyway. If that's the case, many of your practices (and perhaps your methods of educating) might become more efficient. It really is faster to edit a document on the iPad, make changes to it and commit them, and immediately see the results...and then provide an immediate, zero-friction feedback loop for the client, so they can immediately see what's going on.

Compared to the iPhone camera, Photoshop on the web has a number of limitations. For example, it's not able to capture action in the video frame. It's also not able to provide the level of editing, manipulation, and composition that is possible on the desktop application. Also, when moving, rotating, or adding layers to an image, the web previews are shrunk and distorted to achieve better performance of the web application. With Photoshop on the web, you still get the capability to do all these things, along with many other tasks required in the creation of an image. On the web, if you add layer and design a layout in Photoshop, it becomes a page again. In a Photoshop.PSD file, you could design a new page, and save it as we'd normally do with any other program. Then, when you view that page on the web, it's no longer a Photoshop file, it's a plain HTML page. The ability to save Photoshop content as a web page is an exciting new feature of Photoshop on the web. What software do most graphic designers use?
